In the past, people hunted animals and gathered plants for food. They had to move often. They were nomads; they had no permanent place to live. They moved to a new location whenever the food ran out. Nomads often set up camps near a water source. Rivers were a good source of clean water for cooking and drinking. People caught and ate fish from the rivers. They hunted the animals that came to the river to drink. They gathered the plants that grew close to the rivers. The land along rivers was very fertile, and the soil was a good place for growing crops. People learned how to plant crops and grow enough food to feed their families. There was also enough food and water to raise animals.

When people started farming, they began to settle along or near rivers. As time went on, the number of people who settled along rivers increased. Rivers became even more important. People realized rivers could be used to transport people and goods. People began trading food, clothing, and other items up and down the river. Trade between settlements grew.
